From the Desk of Editor

On-line education or the virtual classroom are the new buzzwords in the education environment today as teachers, student and parents, responding to the government mandates about school operations, are coming to grips with new teaching techniques and new uses for technology. It's not easy as both teachers and students are discovering but all parties are showing a willingness to embrace what may become a new standard in education. Colleges are closed due to a public health emergency; administrators should realize that teaching and learning do not have to grind to a halt. They can continue through programs using innovative approaches there are many examples of radio-, television-, cellphone-, on and internet-based learning options that can be deployed. UNESCO recently published a list of platforms and programs for online learning that may be useful to schools. If distance learning is long term, careful attention should be placed the language of instruction, content progression, and relevance for students.
